110

Fahad was a quiet fourteen-year-old boy who lived in a small apartment with his family in Kuwait City. He loved computers and spent many hours learning about games and simple design programmes. Fahad was not a top student at school, but he was creative and full of interesting ideas. His dream was to build something useful for teenagers like himself.

One afternoon, when Fahad arrived home from school, he found his older sister trying to sell her handmade bracelets online. She looked weary and frustrated because she did not know how to take good photos or write clear descriptions, so Fahad offered to help her. He browsed the internet for tips and gradually learned how to create better images. After a short time, more people became interested in her products.

This small success gave Fahad a new idea. He decided to start his own project to earn extra pocket money. He originally planned to design T-shirts with funny and motivational messages for his classmates. However, he soon discovered that planning a business was more difficult than he imagined. If he wanted to succeed, he needed to learn financial skills and manage his time carefully.

Fahad talked to his uncle, who worked as a businessman. His uncle advised him to open an online store and use social media wisely. He also told Fahad not to fear failure or mistakes. Many young people give up quickly when they face a challenge. Ultimately, continuous efforts and learning make the real difference between success and disappointment.

During the winter holiday, a school festival was held at a nearby public park. Fahad took part in the event. He set up a small booth to show his designs. The place was full of teenagers sharing stories, listening to music, and enjoying sports games. He managed to sell several T-shirts on that day. Selling them helped him feel more confident and in control.

The principal of Fahad's school noticed his work and asked him to help design posters for the social club. This was an unexpected opportunity for Fahad. He felt proud because his skills were finally recognised. The posters were filled with colourful pictures and interesting designs. Teachers and students praised the results.

Nowadays, Fahad still enjoys computers, but he uses them more responsibly. He prefers spending time improving his project and learning skills that support his goals rather than playing games all day.

VII. Summary Making (60 Marks)Read the following text, and then do as required.

First aid is an important life skill that everyone should learn. People learn first aid because it helps them respond quickly in emergency situations. Learning first aid builds confidence, as people feel more prepared to help others during accidents.
